Where Tradition Meets Tomorrow

Designing Your Ad
We highly recommend hiring a graphic designer; however, we understand that it is not in everyone's budget. If you are designing your own ad, please read this information carefully and contact tim@talongraphicdesign.com with any questions.

Raise your hand if you are NOT a graphic designer!
Have no fear! We are here to help. The graphic that is on this page talks about "bleed". If you are unfamiliar with this term or are confused about its meaning, ignore it. The dimensions listed above will take the bleed into account for you so you don't need to think twice about it.

Getting Started
There are many programs and apps available for designing your ad. If you are unsure where to start, check out Canva. Other options include, but are not limited to, Microsoft Publisher, Adobe InDesign, Adobe Illustrator, or Adobe Photoshop.

Once you have found a program that works for you, check out the list to the right to find out what dimensions you need to set your document to. The "document dimensions" will be the final size of your ad. Keep in mind though, that you cannot put information right up to the edge of the page. This is where the margins come into play. Anything that is important, such as text, or faces in a photo, need to remain within the dimensions listed under "margins".

Saving Your Artwork for Submission
A PDF is going to be the easiest file type for those of you designing your own ads with little to no experience. Often there is a "Save As" option where you can choose PDF in the file type drop down menu. Unfortunately, that is not always the case. If you don't see it, try looking for "Export" and check if PDF is an option. Still no luck? Head over to "Print" and in the printer drop down, where you would normally see your EPSON, HP, Canon, Brother, etc printer, choose "Print to PDF". Depending on the program you are using, it may also just give you the option to "Print to PDF". Still stuck? Email Tim.
